Crescentic glomerulonephritis associated with bacteriuria in a patient with systemic lupus erythematosus. Crescentic glomerulonephritis is an uncommon lesion that can complicate a variety of glomerular diseases. It is a serious condition that can be fatal. We describe a case of crescentic glomerulonephritis associated with bacteriuria in a patient with systemic lupus erythematosus that led to dialysis in the acute phase and a kidney transplant in the quiescent phase. Bacteriuria in a lupus patient can be associated with a number of diseases and be confused with a urinary tract infection (UTI). In order to reach a definitive diagnosis and guide the therapeutic approach, it is crucial to consider this possibility in the absence of a response to antibiotic therapy. The underlying cause, however, is not always easily recognized, especially in the context of systemic lupus erythematosus, which is a disease that often clinically mimics UTI. In a move one can only describe as
