feature of some of the finest clubs on the planet is that once you have played for them you are never welcome to go near them ever again. This used to be particularly common in England

(Arsene Wenger was once ousted for a decade or so) but it still happens. As someone who has been kicked out of many of them, I can understand the reasons why they do it. Some are private clubs which are not at risk of losing any significant amount of money because they don't have to. Players wouldn't want to piss them off for fear of being banned. Others may simply be private clubs in a town, such as a golf club, and are not really part of the community. Still, it does feel very much like a form of discrimination, and one that is carried out when a club has a new manager. Even when a former manager is brought back. They are rolling the dice on getting it right the second time around. It is far from the only time discrimination occurs. Plenty of clubs have refused to let their players go near the grounds of other teams who they
