the download feature seems to work well, but the qa team wants a better way to test this.

therefore we move to the checking of the headers coming from the server to see if the info needed is there. we have added an extra check to see if the ip address that the user entered is valid. currently, there are lots of questions regarding the new ui and the amount of information displayed. since the release, we have received some feedback and suggestions that we would like to share with the community.

this post will describe some of the user experience problems we are currently working on. version 3.0 of crayon physics deluxe brings many new features to the physics simulation game. replacing the infinity engine framework, the build is integrated with the new and improved roblox platform. this includes a new theme engine. playing with the api has allowed the team to make the game more fair and create more precise physics. it adds support for the motorcycle plus game, a networked multiplayer physics toy. the physics part of the physics shorts contest has also been updated. for other minor changes, please see the release notes. apache cayenne is the open-source web mapping and geospatial data modeling system.

it is based on the popular hibernate java persistence framework. its key features include:

3d mapping, 2d mapping, restful api, model-level security, unified query language (sparql), rdf queries, temporal mapping, data federation, metadata management, caching, and forms-based authentication. apache cayenne contains a lightweight query api implementation. it is java based, oriented to 3d, provides spatial queries for 1d, 2d and 3d geometries, and provides support for model-level security.
