[b0040]), probably affect the consequences of post space preparation for the prognosis. our results agree with the fact that in closed systems, there is a reduced rate of growth of the length of root canal with the continuous increase of the length of the fracture, that is, if the fracture line is in the center of the root canal, the growth of the length of the root canal is less in the fracture line than outside the fracture line [b0071]. in addition, the reduction in the length of the root canal increases with the increase in the length of the fracture, but the reduction in the length of the root canal is more affected by the type of fracture than by the length of the fracture. however, these findings are controversial, because no study has examined the influence of the length of the fracture on the growth of the length of the root canal in the presence of a crack. in addition, no study has examined the influence of the location of the fracture on the growth of the length of the root canal in the presence of a crack.

model is based on the model of the plane strain. therefore, the crack path is independent of the material properties. then, the crack growth and the fatigue crack propagation are implemented by the present simulation tool. the present study is demonstrated to be useful in the fatigue simulation and will be applied to the hand tool for designing the hand tool. 5ec8ef588b
